GNLU PRESS NOTE No. 50/2016

Oxford University Press Publication of GNLU Faculty Research on Human Trafficking

Dear Sir/Madam,

Greetings from GNLU!

Research is an important part of an Academician's career. It helps an academician to enrich his or her knowledge of the relevant field and also enriches the knowledge bank with the help of contribution of his / her research and findings in this ever changing world. GNLU thus lays more stress on research and publications and encourages its faculty members to enrich their knowledge and thereby adding value to their career as well as enriching the knowledge repository of the University. This book entitled "Trafficking of Women and Children: Article 7 of the Rome Statute" is an outcome of the extensive research by GNLU faculty, Dr. Joshua N. Aston. This book has been published by Oxford University Press and is being released in September 2016.

Human Trafficking is one of the most severe problems the world ever has been facing, specifically, the transnational networks and the impact of international criminal and humanitarian laws in dealing with the crime. Analysing the theory and practice of the problem, Dr. Aston provides a perspective on the effectiveness of the UN protocols and examines the role of the International Criminal Court, with a focus on Article 7 of the Rome Statute. The book offers detailed study on human trafficking and its severity, focusing especially on the trafficking of women and children, it identifies the extent of the human trafficking trade, it highlights the law enforcement measures with a focus on Article 7 of the Rome Statute, and examines the feasibility of application of the International Criminal Court in prosecuting cases of crime against humanity. The work proposes various measures for effectively countering human trafficking, with the most significant recommendation of setting up a Convention on Prevention of Crimes against Humanity to combat this form of modern-day slavery. This book is a well-researched
